Going to college is a huge change in life, but in a conversation wiht my daughter the oher day, we discussed how her life has already changed and will never again be what it was before this crisis ended all she had ever known as high school. This entire class is coming to college from a place no other class ever has. Are you planning to do anything differently for them than usual to help what will be a very different transition?	Hello there. We are taking a very purposeful approach to our programs - nothing that has been can be done the same given all the changes our incoming and current students have experienced. We are reviewing the students experience as they transition from HS, Community College and other univerisities as well as students who are continually enrolled students. We look at the experience from admission to fall welcome. We have to care for them and this experience in a very different manner. From their sense of loss of cherished traditions from HS to the potential fear in going to college on a campus they may never have visited prior to their arrival. We want this to be the best experience and we have to be mindful that for all students, this whole year will have forever changed their educational experiences.

suggestions for dealing with long distance: We live in Seattle, and our son is attending.	We understand being far away from your student can be a huge transition. Connect with our office by signing up for our newsletter: To join the Parent and Family Relations eNews, please visit our website www.parent.ttu.edu and you will see the Subscribe link on the home page. You should also like our Facebook page and follow us on Twitter. You can also join the Texas Tech Parents Association, a separate non-profit, at www.texastechparents.org and connect with other out-of-state families.	Hello there...we would encourage your student get involved. Often times the student is homesick and feels the distance because they aren't finding connections that make them feel like this is their new home. We are certain that there are many ways you can support your student from Seattle - get to know their schedule. Ask them about their day. Encourage them to get involved...they aren't going to be different people from who they have been as your child so you know them best. Lastly - don't settle for answers that are short - How was your day - their response okay...ask them to really explain what okay means. They may miss you but as long as they know you support them growing and spreading your wings they will fly!!!
