Elevator Pitches

An Elevator Pitch introduces a potential candidate to a recruiter in a clear, concise way at Job Fair or other networking events. Instead of trying to think of a compelling answer to “Tell me about yourself” in the moment, your elevator pitch prepares what you will say in advance.

Basics:
- Be concise. An Elevator Pitch should only be ~20-30 seconds.
- Be specific. If possible, know something about the company and what they are hiring for before the event. The more tailored your pitch is to the company, the better.
- Be natural. It is a good idea to write down keywords of your pitch at first, but be sure to practice it with friends or a Peer Career Advisor to make it more conversational and natural. Smile and maintain eye contact and an open, relaxed posture (standing or sitting).
- Be enthusiastic. The listener should be left with a positive impression at the end of the pitch and want to keep talking to you.
- Be prepared for follow-up questions. A good elevator pitch should make the listener want to ask follow-up questions, so be prepared to expound on your experience or talk more about your resume.

Broad Content:
- Greeting
  - Say a quick hi, good morning, or how are you to break the ice
- About Me
  - Who am I? Name, major, classification/grad date, and possibly hometown.
  - For a target company, why this company? Especially, what makes me relevant and/or uniquely qualified for this role/company? E.g. classes, research, internships, volunteer work, personal narrative, goals, passion for a specific part of the industry/company, etc.
  - For a general pitch, focus more on general experience and goals.
- Closing
  - This can be a closing statement or a question for the recruiter. You can also offer your resume here if you haven’t already.

Notes on Examples Below:
You will probably notice these examples would sound very rehearsed and robotic if read straight off the page. It is a good idea to write down keywords for your pitch as a start, but you should never recite a written pitch. Practice your pitch without reading it and make it as natural and conversational as possible. You want to begin a conversation, not deliver a monologue.
Examples:

Example 1: Hi, my name is John Doe and I’m a senior Mechanical Engineering major graduating in May. I’m looking for a full-time position, and I’m really interested in XYZ Company because of ______. My resume shows more of my experience working in ____ which seems like it could be a good fit for an entry-level engineer based on what I saw on your website (offer resume for recruiter review).

Example 2: [Greeting Here] I’m John Student, a sophomore electrical engineering major from Houston, and I’m really interested in the aerospace industry. I’m currently involved in Raider Aerospace Society designing the electrical components of a payload we intend to launch in March, so I was particularly curious about the experience of electrical engineers at X Company during the design process. Can you tell me more about that? [Be sure to offer your resume if you haven’t already]

Example 3: [Greeting Here] My name is Jill Student and I am a freshman Computer Science major. I’m just getting started in classes, but I’ve been coding since I was 12 and really enjoy learning new coding languages. I saw on the job description for your summer internship that you use C# which is something I’ve been teaching myself through personal coding projects. Can you tell me more about your internships? [Be sure to offer your resume if you haven’t already]

Example 4: [Greeting Here] My name is Jake Student and I am a senior Petroleum Engineering major from Baton Rouge, LA looking for a full-time job in the oil and gas industry. I grew up around the industry and I’ve gained some experience through internships in midstream and downstream, and I’m hoping to continue learning and applying that experience after graduating. I saw on your website that you are increasing activity in the Permian Basin where I interned last summer. Can you tell me more about that? [Be sure to offer your resume if you haven’t already]
